The Rule Against Perpetuities (Classic Reprint) Jul 15 2022 Excerpt from The Rule Against Perpetuities Although only eight years have passed since the publication of the second edition, about three hundred and eighty new cases on the Rule against Perpetuities (not including those in New York) have been decided during that time, many of them of considerable interest; and my views have altered or developed on several points. Notwithstanding an increase in the average contents of a page, there has been a material addition to the number of pages of the text and of the Appendix. If this had been the first edition of this work, I should undoubtedly have adopted a more consecutive and compact arrangement in several respects than it now exhibits. It has seemed to me, however, to be advantageous to the reader to retain in the present edition a form which shows the development not only of the law but of the author's views during a period of twenty-eight years. The Rule Against Perpetuities : how We Got Here and Future Directions

Jul 03 2021 The historical origins of the rule against perpetuities and the rationale for the modern rule have been lost in Australian academic literature. However, the rule is extremely important given the growth in the number of trusts in Australia since the late 1970s and trends in recent trust case law. Further, although it is often ignored, there is also a critical interaction between the rule and the tax policy. The rule has not been evaluated in Australia recently, but it has been extensively questioned in England and Wales and by the United States over the past three decades. This article focuses on non-charitable trusts and critically analyses the different approaches in these jurisdictions and the arguments for and against the rule's retention. Further, the article argues that greater economic analysis of the rule's effects and the effects of abolition is needed to determine the future role of the rule in Australia. The article also suggests that considering the duration of the perpetuity period alongside monopoly/exclusive use restrictions relating to intellectual property could be a valuable line of future inquiry and argues that such analysis is timely given the Australian Productivity Commission's 2016 inquiry into Intellectual Property Arrangements.

A Rule Against Perpetuities for the Twenty-First Century Nov 19 2022

The common law rule against perpetuities maintained alienation of property by voiding interests in property that did not vest within a life in being at the creation of the interest plus twenty-one years. The rule was applied strictly, often producing harsh results. The courts used a what-might-happen test to strike down nonvested interests that might not have vested in a timely manner. During the last half-century, many legislatures have softened the application of the rule against perpetuities by enacting wait-and-see provisions, which require courts to decide cases based on the facts as they actually developed, and reformation, which allowed some nonvested interests to be reformed to save them from invalidity. This paper describes the common law rule. Then it traces the modern developments, including promulgation of the widely adopted Uniform Statutory Rule Against Perpetuities, which includes an alternate 90 year fixed wait-and-see period to be applied in place of the common law's lives in being plus twenty-one years. The paper continues by exploring the policies which underlie the rule against perpetuities. Then, after finding that there is no significant movement to repeal the rule except for trusts, it is established that proposals for that federal law, including federal transfer taxes, cannot and should not be used to implement the policies served by the rule itself. There is a continuing need for state rules against perpetuities. The paper proposes that the rule be modified to make it more understandable and easier to apply. The proposed rule would replace lives in being plus twenty-one years with a fixed term of years. This would eliminate most of the difficulties encountered in application of the rule. Wait-and-see and reformation are part of the proposed rule. The proposed rule provides for determination of valid interests at the end of the fixed term of year Rule and contains a definition of "vested" to enable judges and attorneys to apply the rule in cases which will arise many years in the future.
